The ra es will begin at 2:30 o'clock, the heats of the roadsters' race being brought in between the others, so that there will be no weary waits. The track will be placed in the very best condition, and with four entries in each race fine sport is promised. Should the rain prevent, today's programme will be carried out tomorrow.

The trouble at Fordyce, on the Paramore railroad, caused by a constable named Torrence stopping a freight train and attaching it for a justice of the peace judgment has been closed up. Judge Caldwell, of the Federal Court, telegraphed to the constable Saturday that the road, being in the hands of a receiver, was not liable to State courts, and that he must release the train. The officer refused to comply, and defied the United States Court. Yesterday Deputy-Marshal Basye was sent there with an order to bring Torrence to Little Rock for contemptof court. To-day the deputy telegraphed that the train has been liberated, and the officer has left the place. Descriptions of him have been sent to surrounding towns, and he will probably be captured.

HE MADE AN EXCUSE to get rid of her, and told the procures he was not pleased with the lady. She begged him to return, and when he called again he found the woman whom he met first, who said she was afraid she was being watched, and would return was being watched, and would return home but would come back again at 10 o'clock. Thiers did not wait. He was particularly anxious to find out if the pro-curess ever brought young and innocent girls to her house, as he had been in-formed. He said to her that none of those he had seen struck his fancy, and asked if there were no young girls who were in the habit of visiting there. She said there were none at present, but she would send out and see what she could do. In about a quarter of an hour a fifteen-year-old

The procuress said she could find no one else that night, but knew of some one whom she believed would consent to come with a little judicious maneuvering, and who could not fail to please him. She then gave a minute deplease him. She then gave a minute de-scription of a young girl who has just put on long dresses—a plump and pretty little brunette, not more than sixteen years of age. This girl, the procuress said, was still as spotless as the snow, but she hoped, through her craving for finery, which her parents were unable to afford, to induce her to consent to her vile plot. Tuesday night Thiers saw the procuress again, and EMPEATED A CONVERSATION she had held in the morning with the girl The only thing that kept her back was the-fear of discovery. "I told her she s-ould have all the fine dresses and bonnets she desired, and that she should never want as long as she lived." So repugnant to all of his feelings was this infernal scheme that Thiers could not bring himself to al-low it to go any further, and though he had not succeeded in gaining sufficient testimony upon which to base a warrant of arrest, he determined not to visit the place again. He did not find Mag at home last night, but warned the people about the place that they would all be arrested if there was a repetition of the occurrence mentioned.

He partially recovered soon after his wounds were dressed, but his pain afterward was so great as to cause him to lose his senses, and his wild ravings filled the block. As soon as the ambulance could be procured he was sent to the hospital. His condition last night was such as to make his recovery extremely doubtful. The doctor was heard to remark while dressing the wounds: "If it had been a white man he would never have reached the station-house alive."
